Abstract

The study seeks to make visible the importance of everyday ties to the places where the suburban habitat has structurally developed as an extension and stereotype of modernity. Recently, these places are being recognized as small towns in the face of renewed approaches to the urban, no longer strictly functionalist but rather aimed at a higher quality of life by introducing public spaces that operate as a glue between urban pieces solely residential.

Keywords: everyday life, urban rehabilitation, regeneration, intersectional space, public space, contemporary urbanism, transformation
